The World Hates Bush

by Michael in New York on 10/29/2004 08:00:00 PM

Hey, Presidential elections actually ARE a popularity contest, so it's interesting to note that if the world were voting, Kerry would win by a landslide. And if you're talking the free world, then it's an even bigger win. Bush has been rejected by the two groups he claims to care about the most: the widowed spouses and children of the 9-11 victims and the people of Iraq. He's also been rejected by almost all of our traditional allies and the democracies of the world, such as Mexico, Canada, France, Germany, the British people, and many, many others.

But some people like him -- namely the dictators and thugs of the world. Islamic terrorists in Spain give him the thumbs up. So does Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, China, Czar Putin of Russia, and Iran. If anyone could get into the Orwellian nightmare that is North Korea, we imagine Kim would vote for Bush too.

"The University of Maryland-based Program on International Policy Attitudes surveyed 34,000 people in 35 countries from May to August. Its finding: In 30 countries, Kerry enjoyed the support of a majority or a plurality; in three countries, respondents liked Bush better; and in two they were tied," says the LA Times.
