

Chablis on ice

The strong-willed Lady Chablis—best known for being her larger-than-life self in both the novel and movie Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil—played an unaccustomed role on March 15: damsel in distress. Chablis spent five hours behind bars in Aiken, Ga., before her lawyer showed up with $1,325 to pay a traffic fine. The penalty stemmed from a January incident, when the Lady was stopped for doing 100 miles per hour in a 65 zone.

"When you're driving a Cadillac, a girl thinks she's driving 65 when she's actually going 85 or a hundred," Chablis explained by telephone from San Juan, Puerto Rico—on a vacation she claims she earned after the mini whirlwind of publicity following her arrest.

Chablis notes that jail has its pluses: "A girl can stay in control in jail," she says. "I can hardly stay in control in San Juan with all these cute boys around. I'm going out soon for Latin Night." But isn't it always Latin Night in San Juan? Perhaps, she concedes, but "it isn't 'Latin Night With the Lady Chablis' every night, is it?"
